deal of attention to the school system of the state and urges the establishment of social centers. It would have a revision of the game laws for the better protection of wild game. It would exploit further the scenic beauties of the state to stimulate tourist travel. It recommends an extension of work on the highways.

Naturally considerable space has been given to the subject of prison reform and recites what has already been accomplished in that direction.

The reading of the message was not concluded until a late hour when the joint session was dissolved and each house adjourned, the senate to ten o'clock this morning, and the house to one o'clock this afternoon.

No description of the first day's proceedings would be complete without mention of the large attendance of young ladies, as well as men young and old, (all the ladies were young and beautiful), all anxious to know what the two houses were going to do about the clerkships and who would be likely to be called to operate the long batteries of typewriters in rooms adjoining the chambers.
